The Garcias are a Mexican family who have lived in the United States for generations. They are proud of their heritage and their community, but they also know the challenges that come with living in a country that is often hostile to immigrants.

The Joneses are a white American family who have recently moved to the border town of Laredo, Texas. They are looking for a new start, but they soon find themselves grappling with the realities of life in a community that is divided by race and class.

When the Garcias' teenage daughter, Maria, and the Joneses' teenage son, Ethan, fall in love, their families are forced to confront their own prejudices and fears. The relationship between Maria and Ethan is a powerful reminder that love can transcend all barriers, but it is also a reminder of the challenges that face interracial couples in the United States.

As Maria and Ethan's relationship deepens, they find themselves drawn into a dangerous world of drug trafficking and violence. The Garcias and the Joneses must work together to protect their children, but they soon realize that the stakes are higher than they ever imagined.
